Benefits of innovation

Absent from the Post-Gazette's July 16 article "Phone Merger Fears Mount," about proposed telecommunications mergers, was any perspective on the benefits that this transaction will deliver to consumers and businesses in Pennsylvania.

That perspective is necessary if your readers are to have a full understanding of why these transactions are taking place. Verizon's proposed merger with MCI is part of the continuing evolution of the telecom industry that is being driven by customer needs and technology advances. The merger will create a strong new competitor by bringing together the complementary assets and capabilities of Verizon and MCI, allowing Verizon to continue its transformation from a regional telephone carrier into a national broadband communications company.

Despite the exaggerated claims of special interests, this acquisition does not alter the dynamics of the competitive communications marketplace. Competition from wireless, e-mail, cable telephony, VoIP, Instant Messaging, PDAs and other nontraditional technologies has given customers more choices, more services and a wide array of pricing and plans. Such competition will only increase. Customers of every size and description are currently using these technologies and will continue to do so after this deal is completed.

MCI's global assets will greatly enhance the combined company's ability to compete for large business customers, the most competitive sector in the communications market. But even after the merger Verizon will still compete with numerous national and international companies to serve that sector.

The Verizon/MCI transaction will strengthen the combined company's ability to deliver the benefits of innovation to customers of all sizes, from residential customers to the largest enterprise businesses. We look forward to delivering the benefits of this transaction to consumers and businesses in Pennsylvania.
