TWC's Marcus on Comcast Merger: We Remain Committed to Providing Great Customer Experiences

Last week we announced an agreement to merge with Comcast Corporation. This is a historic time, and I'm excited about the tremendous benefits this merger will bring to consumers. Comcast and Time Warner Cable have been behind all of the cable industry's most important innovations—high-speed Internet, DVRs and Video On Demand, to name just a few. The combined company will accelerate the pace of innovation and the deployment of new products and services.

While we work toward the merger, we remain committed to executing our operating plan and following through on our promise to deliver great experiences for our customers—a topic I blogged about last month. Following the announcement I've had lots of discussions with employees throughout TWC and my message to everyone has been the same—stay the course. We still have a very important job to do. We're off to a great start in 2014 and we continue to build on our momentum.

Even as I write this, our technicians and engineers are installing new equipment in our hubs and nodes for the rollout of what we're currently calling the TWC Maxx customer experience in New York City and Los Angeles. Last week we began offering 100 Mbps download speeds in NYC, and we'll be making another major announcement about speed increases very soon. Everywhere, from Maine to Hawaii, we're continuing to make aggressive investments in our network to provide superior customer service.

On a personal level, I must admit I have mixed emotions about all of this. While I'm truly excited about the opportunities the merger with Comcast brings for consumers, our shareholders, and for TWC's 52,000 employees, I'm sad I won't be leading this company into its very bright future. Until then, I'm committed to completing this merger with our company in the best shape it's ever been in, and I remain proud to be Time Warner Cable's CEO.
