The following is a transcript of a video clip of an episode of CNBC's Squawk Box television program which aired on February 9, 2018:

JOE KERNAN, CNBC, PRESENTER:

Dave Dorman, the Chairman of CVS Health is going to be here. Also AT&T CEO Randall Stephenson.

KERNAN:

A lot still ahead on Squawk Box. We're live on Pebble Beach. Up next, the story that still has people scratching their heads, JP Morgan, Amazon and Berkshire Hathaway are teaming up to tackle healthcare. We're going to talk to CVS Chair David Dorman about this and so much more.

REBECCA QUICK, CNBC, PRESENTER:

Healthcare providers are looking for remedies to try and fix unmet needs in the healthcare system. Back in December CVS announced an acquisition of Aetna, and then an unexpected trio announcing a plan to try and create technology solutions that they hope will provide better care options for their employees. That trio is one that caught a lot of attention, Jeff Bezos, Jamie Dimon and Warren Buffet. Joining us right now to share his perspective on what's been happening in the industry is legendary executive and investor David Dorman. He is the Chairman of the Board of CVS Health. Dave, thanks for being here today.

DAVE DORMAN, CVS HEALTH CHAIRMAN:

You bet.

QUICK:

We have talked with you over the years over the changes in healthcare. When CVS became much more than just a pharmacy and got into prescriptions and much more than all of that you told us about the changes that were coming.

But we have seen changes in the last few months like nobody had anticipated. What's happening in the system right now?

DORMAN:

It's the three trillion dollar part of our economy. Healthcare is huge and growing. I think the Buffet, Bezos, Diamond thing is, We're mad as hell and we're not going to take it anymore. But as to how they actually do it, the closer you get to the giant pile you realize that almost 60% of the cost is in providers, so doctors and hospitals. That's very disaggregated. And if you're trying to do this for your own employees you find that your buying power has to be concentrated somewhere. But all healthcare is provided locally where people live, which is very disaggregated. So CVS with 10,000 stores, a store within 3 miles of 80% of the population, a clinic in the store, combining with Aetna we think we can bring more capabilities to bear at the local level and serve national organizations and small organizations as well.

QUICK:

Does that mean that you're going to be pushing people to go into their local CVS to do things that they might have gone to their doctor before?

DORMAN:

That's right. Our MinuteClinics have already demonstrated the ability to provide great care for routine illnesses and to provide the ability to monitor chronic illness. Chronic illness costs are a huge part of the whole pie. So people who have diabetes, for example, and need to stay on their meds, stay monitored closely, we can do those kinds of routine functions very easily. And other diagnostics that'll be aided by technology that come about.

QUICK:

Humana just announced that it's looking to buy Kendra, they're a long term care facility. And it just makes you wonder, is it the days of being able to be an insurance company, have they been pushed aside at this point, with everybody looking to team up with somebody else?

DORMAN:

United Healthcare is sort of the quiet giant in the space who has done this for years. They've had multiple lines of business outside of insurance. But the insurance core gives them the ability to quarterback and work with all the lives that they insure to come to a better outcome. We've been doing the same kind of thing quietly at CVS. But with the addition of Aetna we'll have a lot more capability than we did before.

QUICK:

Going back to what we saw from JPMorgan, Berkshire Hathaway and Amazon, does this worry the industry? We have seen stocks across the board sell off as the thought that they're going to be jumping in.

DORMAN:

I usually wake up every morning waiting to see what rumor there is about Amazon. Today it's FedEx and UPS, great they're not talking about healthcare.

QUICK:

Right, they're the ones that have seen their stock selloff.

DORMAN:

And the fact is, Amazon creates fear and loathing from anyone because they've been so powerful in the retail space but also in the tech space. I think as a practical matter what they're saying is, Look at our cost increases. Jamie Dimon is a tough guy. He's looking at his costs going up 10% a year as a big part of his overall employee cost and says, What can we do about it? So I can easily see he and Warren Buffet and Jeff say, Gee, we're all smart guys. We have smart guys. What can we do? The fact is, the doctor on Main Street isn't controlled by them, isn't managed by them, their employees have to make individual good decisions that will lead to their health. So, good luck. I think it's a very deep pool. We supply JPMorgan PBM benefits today. I suspect that we'll see a lot of things churning here. But when you start off by saying, This is going to be a not for profit operation. I can assure you that it will not be for profit.

QUICK:

Whether they want it to be or not was your point?

DORMAN:

Exactly.

QUICK:

But did you wake up that morning and think, Oh my gosh. Here's one more thing to deal with?

DORMAN:

Yeah. Because we've been hearing so long about Amazon entering prescription drugs, which there are 29 large retailer brick-and-mortar categories, Amazon is in 28 of them. The one that they weren't in were prescriptions. So people said, "Naturally. Well there's a reason that they haven't gotten into the pharmacy business, it's hard. You can't just decide to offer a few prescriptions, or 10,000 prescription drugs. You have to make it available, you have to be accessible. So I look at that somewhat cynically and say, if they enter they're not going to do it in a broad based way unless they buy someone. If they decided to buy Express Scripts for example, that'd be a really serious entry into the space. But with respect to the three of them, this is probably the third agglomeration of large entities who got together and said, "We're going to combine our buying power. We're going to innovate. We're going to do it differently." So it's really not a new idea. It's just the most recent one.

QUICK:

Dave, thank you so much for your time. It's great to see you today.

DORMAN:

You bet, thanks.
