Item 8.01 Other Events.

On September 25, 2014, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ruled on two sets of pending appeals concerning certain environmental matters in the Lower Fox River and Green Bay in Wisconsin (the "Site").

In NCR Corp. v. Geo. A. Whiting Paper Co., which we previously disclosed as the "Whiting Litigation," the court of appeals vacated the decision regarding allocation of responsibility and remanded the case to the district court to consider whether additional "equitable factors" would affect the district court's decision to allocate all costs associated with the OU2-5 cleanup and all natural resources damages to NCR, or whether, after considering additional factors, the district court would restore the original allocation.

In the Whiting Litigation opinion, the court of appeals also affirmed the district court's decision that NCR would not bear a share of liability for the cleanup that the P. H. Glatfelter Company (the "Company"), WTM I Company and Menasha Corporation performed in Little Lake Butte des Morts, also known as OU1.

In United States v. P. H. Glatfelter Co. and NCR Corporation, which we have previously disclosed as the "Government Action," the court of appeals vacated an injunction issued May 1, 2013, requiring the Company and others to comply with the requirements of a unilateral administrative order ("UAO") issued in November 2007 for implementation of remedial action in Operable Units 2-5 of the Site. The Company and others remain subject to the UAO, but the court of appeals held that the United States is not entitled to an injunction to enforce it. In addition to the parties subject to the UAO, other parties have certain responsibilities to implement the remedies.

The cleanup work under the UAO is presently proceeding under NCR's direction. The UAO may obligate the Company, with others, to assure that the ongoing cleanup continues at a satisfactory pace. The Whiting Litigation will ultimately reallocate among the parties all costs incurred to complete the work based upon "equitable factors."

The Company is evaluating the court of appeals' rulings and the impact, if any, on the Company's related reserves and future cash flows. There can be no assurance that these rulings will not have a material adverse effect on the Company's consolidated financial position, liquidity or results of operations.
