Dear Colleagues,

Progress continues in our planning for the integration of Merck and Schering-Plough. Last week, we held our Integration Kickoff Meeting in New Brunswick, N.J. It was the first time the Integration Teams from Merck and Schering-Plough were able to meet and begin planning together.

Meetings of this kind are common during integration planning but ours was unique. The teams came together in a true spirit of collaboration and respect for each other and our organizations. Merck team members led their breakout sessions with the goal of building an open approach to planning to ensure we are very thoughtful about all of the stakeholders impacted by this merger. Schering-Plough counterparts were equally open about their past merger integration experiences. We heard repeatedly from team members how much they appreciated the collaboration and how much they learned from each other.

Another aspect of our meeting that was unique was the level of planning we were able to achieve. The teams developed robust charter statements to guide their work and clarified what activities and milestones will be critical to meet for Day 1 (the day when Merck and Schering-Plough become one company). They also spent time identifying our interdependencies – the critical areas where we need to work across divisions and functions to ensure this merger is successful right from the beginning.

On our second day, Dick Clark joined the meeting to share his vision of integration planning and to take questions. He spoke about the need for the combined company to have the right culture – one that is customer-focused, one where people have the courage and candor to challenge ideas, and one where rapid and disciplined decision-making is the norm. He shared some reactions from the employee meetings he and members of his leadership team recently participated in at Schering-Plough. And he talked about our goal of creating a new company that is greater than the sum of its parts alone.

Organizational Design and Talent Selection

A common question among colleagues during the planning process relates to organizational structure and talent selection. In other words, what will this new company look like and where do I fit in? We know that is an important aspect of the integration. It is too early in the process to answer this question but over the coming weeks we will finalize the approach we will use to begin designing our organizational structure and selecting talent for the future. Actual decisions regarding organizational structures and people will be made later in the integration process. For example, we expect that some decisions regarding our senior leadership levels will be made prior to Day 1 while the vast majority of organizational decisions will be made after Day 1. Any announcement about senior level decisions will occur in the period surrounding Day 1.

Focus on Our Stakeholders

In the meantime it's important for all of us to remain focused on our core businesses. The work of the Integration Teams, while important, does not take the place of the critical work every Merck and Schering-Plough colleague does to meet our commitments to patients, customers, investors, employees and all the other stakeholders who count on us every day.

Stakeholders were clearly in our minds during the Kickoff meeting. In fact, one of our themes involved these stakeholders – or "Voices" – who live behind the merger. We are sharing with you one of these Voices segments, the Voices of Leaders. Click here to view. Over the coming weeks, we plan to share more of these segments with you and also continue to update you regularly on our progress.

Sincerely,

Adam Schechter and Brent Saunders

VOICE OF THE LEADERS Script / 04-04-09

Richard T. Clark Chairman, President & CEO, Merck & Co., Inc.: Certainly bringing Merck together with Schering-Plough today is as transformational as the decision in 1953 to take Merck and Sharp & Dohme and bring them together.

Tom Koestler EVP & President, Schering Plough Research Institute : When you think about what our mission is, it's really very simple. It's all about patients, and it's about doctors and it's about innovation and bringing new therapies to treat unmet medical needs to both these patients, and to the doctors.

Peter Kim EVP, President Merck Research Laboratories: It's obvious from the due diligence that we've done, that they share the scientific excellence and the focus on scientific excellence that we have here at Merck.

Rick Bowles SVP, Global Quality Operations, Schering-Plough: The center of earning trust everyday has been patients, and when I look at the values and vision and mission of these two companies, there's remarkable alignment.

Willie Deese EVP, President Merck Manufacturing Division: It brings great capability in the area of biologics and sterile manufacturing, capabilities that we're building. It brings a much broader footprint for manufacturing going forward, so all of those things are going to complement very well our current capabilities and I think in this case, the addition of one and one is greater than two.

Lori Queisser SVP, Global Compliance & Business Practices, Schering-Plough: One of my hopes for this merger is that we will take this as an opportunity to create the preeminent pharmaceutical company, perhaps the preeminent company in any industry.

Richard T. Clark Chairman, President & CEO, Merck & Co., Inc.: When you combine these two companies, they will be much more important than two companies standing by themselves. And the reason for that truly is the alignment around therapeutic areas in research, the alignment of in-line products in a diversified portfolio, the global presence that we have.

Tom Koestler EVP & President, Schering Plough Research Institute: So I think one of the greatest challenges we have is to instill some excitement, some true excitement, about the value of what we're creating here for many generations to come.

Rick Bowles SVP, Global Quality Operations, Schering-Plough: Schering-Plough doesn't disappear in this - Schering-Plough continues in many, many ways.

Peter Kim EVP, President Merck Research Laboratories: And when you put the two pipelines together, it's amazing how they just dovetail together.

Tom Koestler EVP & President, Schering Plough Research Institute: When you just think about the combined portfolio between Schering-Plough and Merck, you have over 27 products in Phase 2, and over 18 products in late-phase registration, and several more also in pre-registration. That is a magnificent combination of a pipeline going forward.

Peter Kim EVP, President Merck Research Laboratories: And the remarkable thing is, even though we're interested in the same therapeutic areas, there are very, very few cases where we actually have overlap in terms of the mechanism of action. So we're actually adding a whole bunch of new mechanisms in the areas that we're already interested in.

Richard T. Clark Chairman, President & CEO, Merck & Co., Inc.: One of the major feedbacks we hear from the shareholders when we made the visits during the last week was how do you bring two large companies together. How do you make sure there is no business disruption?

Tom Koestler EVP & President, Schering Plough Research Institute: What we need to do is to capture the value of all those best in class and first in class opportunities that we have in our respective pipelines.

Rick Bowles SVP, Global Quality Operations, Schering-Plough: And what can we learn about each other's journey not in an analytical way just in the magic of what we've both done in the past several years to support patients.

Ken Frazier EVP, President Global Human Health, Merck & Co., Inc.: So as we bring together these businesses I believe we will have the basis to combine them and to ensure that our customers have the right kinds of interactions across the spectrum of opportunities that we would like to provide them.

Edgar Filing: MERCK & CO INC - Form 425

Lori Queisser SVP, Global Compliance & Business Practices, Schering-Plough: I have great confidence in our people, the people I work with here at Schering-Plough, the people I've met at Merck and I know that we can do this.

Peter Kim EVP, President Merck Research Laboratories: I look forward to welcoming the Schering-Plough R&D scientists into Merck research laboratories.

Tom Koestler EVP & President, Schering Plough Research Institute: It's all about our people and the talent that exists in Schering-Plough and in Merck. And I would ask you to be very sensitive at a time of great ambiguity for our associates to take the time, reach out, be proactive, listen, learn, absorb, and communicate. And I think if you follow those principles, I think we'll do a great job.
