"This strategic combination will benefit the shareholders, students and employees of both CEC and Whitman," said John M. Larson, CEC's Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer. "Healthcare is a $1.4 trillion industry in the United States, and Whitman's strong position in health education will accelerate our expansion in this high-growth field. Additionally, its curricular offerings in information technology and business studies will further enhance our leadership in these fields. The merger will also increase degree options available to students throughout the CEC system, add three regionally accredited schools to the CEC network of schools and give us an additional regionally accredited online platform.

"Whitman campuses will benefit from CEC's proven formula of investment in marketing, retention, placement and curriculum development, which has increased student population, improved placement success and driven significant gains in revenues and operating income at all schools acquired by CEC," Larson said.
